the second great awakening featured a belief that each new believer experienced an identifiable conversion moment based on a profession of faith in Jesus Christ as Lord. The evangelists of this era moved away from the doctrine of predestination that was a central tenet of old school Calvinists to a theology based on human free will. In fact, this is the period that gives rise to what is known as the second great awakening. Like the first, it is a period of revival, but it is being put forward as a sense of the great expansion.

16 Nov 2016: The second great awakening was a religious revival movement in the first half of the 19th century. It emphasized emotion and enthusiasm but also democracy. New religious denominations emerged that restructured churches to allow for more people involved in leadership, an emphasis on man's equality before God, and personal witness. The second great awakening was an early 19th-century revival spurred on by the uncertainty of life following the revolution, starting in the frontier as preachers visited settler towns to preach. Unlike the first great awakening, the second saw new religious movements founded, most prominently the Mormons but also Adventists.

The second great awakening led to two movements in reform that is changing laws and behaviors to make society better. One of these was the temperance movement, which believed that drinking alcohol was not good for society. The other was abolitionism, which wanted to end slavery.
